The Equinox Center, a nonprofit policy and research center focused on creating a better economy, environment and quality of life in San Diego, has announced that it will be offering sustainability fellowships to local graduate students thanks to support from the Marcus Family Foundation.

The fellowships, which focus on either new media or research, will offer graduate students academic credit as well as a stipend as they work alongside many of the center's staff members to solve local issues.

For more information on the Sustainability Fellowships, go to equinoxcenter.org/about/career-opportunities. The deadline for applications for fall fellowships is today, but the center will also offer fellowship positions for this summer.
